HOT BATHS CURE DELIRIUM

Recommended by Eminent Physicians as the Best Remedy That Has Been Discovered.

There are two kinds of delirium, that which accompanies fever and that which is afebrile, following a serious illness or the result of exhaustion or shock. The first is caused by the poisoning of the neurones of the brain cortex by the toxins of disease.

Dr. Edward Livingston Hunt, assistant professor of clinical neurology, College of Physicians and Surgeons, Columbia university, told the East New York Medical society recently that the four things to do in delirium were: (1) To secure sleep; (2) to overcome the motor unrest; (3) to prop and maintain the patient's vitality; (4) to discover and if possible remove the cause.

He deprecated the use of drugs to produce sleep, and said hot baths at 90 to 95 degrees, lasting from half an hour to two hours, with the hot water running constantly to maintain the same temperature, was the best treatment. Where such hot water baths were impossible, a wet pack was the best substitute. "This consists of a sheet wrung out in warm water, which covers the patient. Over this are placed blankets tightly drawn, with the arms held down. The patient must be kept in this for an hour."

A delirious patient must be kept in bed. Liquid nourishment must be given constantly and persistently. The best form is eggs and milk.

The heart must be watched, and at the first sign of failure strychnine and digitalis must be administered. Only a physician can do this.

The bowels and kidneys also must be kept steadily at work.

OLD-WORLD MUSIC REVIVED

Connoisseurs Welcome With Delight
the Return to Instrument Belonging to the Past.

For the musical connoisseur a new and delightful experience during the last season has been the appearance of the Russian musician, M. Votitchenko, and the old-world instrument, known as the tympanon, upon which he plays, the London Chronicle states.

This seventeenth century instrument of the dulcimer family, a musical ancestor of the clarinet, has been rescued from oblivion by M. Votitchenko, under whose fingers it has attained a high degree of artistic expression.

At a concert held in aid of funds for the wounded the young Russian player delighted his hearers with a number of seventeenth and eighteenth century pieces, some of them adapted from music originally played on the instrument in Louis XIV's time, and others arranged from Russian folk tunes.

In the case of the latter the music seems to have a certain affinity for the instrument, which as a matter of fact, has been in Russia for several generations in M. Votitchenko's family. These "Old Memories of Little Russia" and a "Rhapsody of Volga Songs" both proved very exquisite and delightful, as did also a fantasy on old French tunes, and some other pieces. Much of the charm of each, it need hardly be said, lay in the very beautiful and sympathetic way in which the artist handled the instrument.

First Hand Grenades.

Hand grenades, which are playing a prominent part in the present war, were revived in modern times by Gen. Baden-Powell during the siege of Mafeking. They were afterwards used with dire effect against the Russians by the "slim" Japanese. But they first appeared among the equipment of the British army in the summer of 1878, when John Evelyn records: "Now were brought into service a new kind of soldiers called grenadiers, who were dexterous in flinging hand grenades. They had furred caps with coped crowns, which made them look very fierce."

These primitive grenadiers, after hurling their missile, charged the enemy with hatchets, and were frequently killed by their own firework. Besides grenades in pouches and battle-axes, they were armed with muskets, slings (?), swords and daggers; and bayonets, when first invented, were appropriated to the grenadiers. So they must have been walking arsenals.

A Bargain.
"I don't mind giving your college half a million," said the magnate, "but I'm a great believer in reciprocity."
"I catch your drift," replied the solicitor. "How would a degree of LL. D. suit you?"
"Doctor of Laws, eh? That would do first rate. I could use the title all right and if anybody ever asked me for legal advice, I could turn him over to my lawyer."

Grasshoppers a Plague.

Reports from several parts of Central America indicate that the plague of grasshoppers will be more widespread this year than last. The insects have extended their ravages from the Pacific side to the Atlantic, and are working havoc on the banana plantations along the coast.

Strenuous Kindness.

She—Here's a story in the paper that tells about such a kind policeman.

He—What did he do?
She—He found a man asleep in the street, it says, and fanned him till he woke up.
